

Who are the people you respect the most? Those of integrity, those whose walk matches their talk. Those who tell you something and follow through with their promise, and expect nothing in return. As children, we are told never to lie, but yet every politician I have heard or seen on T.V. does that for a living. When I met Randy White I was just fifteen, and I already had seen a world full of people that tell you one thing then forget about it or just never intend to follow through from the start. I am now eighteen, and of voting age. In those three years I have never known Randy to ever not do exactly what he said he would do. You can think, “well she’s just a kid, what does she know?” That’s exactly my point, who would keep their word to a kid? My lifestyle is much different than Randy’s, so I do not agree with everything he stands for; but then what person can anyone of us say we agree with everything they do?

This is how I know; if Randy promises to do something, that is exactly what he will do. As I sat and thought about what I could do for Randy to help him win this election, I have no money; I have little time between working, school and friends. So I thought that the least I could do is say what I personally know about Randy. When Randy White tells you he will do something, I will stand by this completely; I know he will do just that. Randy White will work for education. Randy White will work for jobs in Illinois. Randy White will do all this with love and compassion; I would trust Randy White with my life. His walk matches his talk.
